The law related to computer crime is changing Very quickly. Modern criminals are using computers to help them commit crimes like identity theft and to make it easier to commit old crimes like theft or fraud.

One issue that makes it hard to fight computer crime is that this type of offence is often more difficult to solve than traditional crimes because the criminals are invisible and their actions may be hard to prove.

Another issue is that it is quite difficult to prosecute a computer criminal successfully because usually nothing is actually stolen or physically damaged. In recent years computer crime has increased as the number of people using the internet to buy things or to access their bank accounts has grown.

This new type of business has attracted techno-criminals who order goods without paying, or break into the computer systems of businesses and move money to their own account or send viruses which can seriously damage computers and information they contain. Criminals can use the Internet to plan crimes and pass on confidential information more easily than meetings or telephone conversations.

The Geneva Convention is a set of international laws that protect injured soldiers and civilians during war. The law makes sure that every person is treated well and with respect. The first treaty was written in 1864 but it is often changed due to different types of war. It was significantly updated in 1949 after World War Two. Syria is one of 200 countries in the world that agrees to follow the laws of the Geneva Convention. The agreement is important because during war a country might need help from neutral organizations to care for the wounded. The Red Crescent is one of the organisations that provides aid during times of war. It also helps injured people during peacetime, and you may have seen ambulances with the Red Crescent symbol in the street.

Countries who 'follow the laws of the Geneva Convention must not attack civilians, and they are not allowed to fight someone who is already hurt. It is illegal to ignore these rules, and a country found guilty of committing war crimes will be tried in a court of law and can be severely punished. All soldiers, civilians and prisoners may receive medical help from doctors and nurses. They can be taken to a hospital without being attacked.

Satire is a genre of literature that makes fun of people. In satire, human or individual vices or weaknesses are examined and mocked. Although satire is generally funny, its main purpose is to criticise a person, a group or an institution in an intelligent manner. Not all satirists have the luxury of being able to criticise people or society without fear of the authorities taking action against them. Because of this, many Roman satirists criticised imaginary individuals, or people and events from many years before. To the more intelligent of their readers or audience, the real targets were obvious, not that the authorities and the rich and powerful (who were often those being mocked) could prove this or stop people from laughing. There are many different forms of satire, but all of them are intended to criticise or mock, though some have done it less obviously than others. Satire was famously used in ancient Greece, although the name comes from the ancient Roman language, Latin. Juvenal is one of the most famous and imaginative of the Roman satirists, and was inspired by earlier Greek writers such as Aristophanes. Alexander Pope, a leading 18th century poet and a skilled translator of Latin, was also influenced by the Greek and Roman authors who came before him. Samuel Beckett's work shows how satire is still relevant and interesting in the modern day, by using absurdism to satire life itself.
